MESSAGES CONVEYED
1. Strengthen the veterinary profession and national Veterinary Services, as defined by the OIE, to secure the planet against natural or intentional biological disasters.
The work of the veterinary profession and the Veterinary Services is now recognised as a global public good. Rich countries also acknowledge that support for the Veterinary Services and the veterinary profession in developing and transition countries is a priority, not only to promote development around the world, but also to protect the world against the spread and the re-emergence of animal diseases and zoonoses.

2. Animal production food safety: the role of the veterinarian at the farm, at abattoirs and agro-industries, throughout the entire food system
Improvement is still needed in many aspects of food safety control in terms of cost and efficacy, especially at the farm and during ante- and post-mortem abattoir inspections, at agro-industries and microbiological control processes. Measures should be tailor-made for the range and prevalence of hazards in the particular animal population. Management of all these hazards by the Veterinary Services and the veterinary profession needs to be carried out in a way that optimises the use of available resources in both the public health and the animal health sector.

3. Veterinarians in the provision of animal health services
The veterinary profession is essential for the improvement of animal health. Veterinary Services and the Veterinary profession take care of the health of the animal world, from companion animals (pets) to farm animals and wildlife. They are in charge of disease prevention, treatments, quality of feed and quality of housing and breeding of all animals. Healthy companion animals are also critical in the human-animal bond phenomenon that can have a positive influence on human health.

4. National veterinary associations: the role of the private veterinarian and his/her relationship to the national veterinary services.
There is need for increased communication and bonding between the national veterinary associations and the national Veterinary Services to help facilitate rapid identification, response and elimination of newly emerging diseases.
